PUBLISHER'S NOTE

In May 1931 the Delegates of the Press instructed their officers to investigate the possibility of preparing an entirely new Latin Dictionary. Some eighteen months later draft plans were approved for the compilation of a dictionary independent alike of Lewis & Short on the one hand and of the Thesaurus Linguae Latinae on the other, which would treat classical Latin from its beginnings to the end of the second century A.D., and which was to be approximately one-third longer than Lewis & Short; the work was to be carried out by a staff directly responsible to the Delegates. Professor A. Souter of the University of Aberdeen was appointed Editor, and Mr. J. M. Wyllie was seconded from the Oxford English Dictionary to the new venture as Assistant Editor.* It was then estimated that such a dictionary would take twelve years to prepare.

Full-time work began in the autumn of 1933. Quotations, ultimately numbering well over a million, were collected partly by the staff in Oxford, and partly by some fifty outside volunteers working closely with the Oxford staff. A start was made on editorial work, but by 1939 it was clear that progress, whether measured in terms of quality or quantity, was unsatisfactory. In the same year Professor Souter retired from the editorship, and Dr. Cyril Bailey, a Delegate of the Press, and Mr. Wyllie were appointed co-editors, with Dr. Bailey as the senior.

Credit for the scheme of the dictionary and organization of the work in its early years is due principally to Mr. Wyllie. With the outbreak of war, work on the Dictionary inevitably slowed down, and as members of the staff went off on war service it was virtually suspended, though a skeleton staff under Dr. Bailey kept the project alive. On Mr. Wyllie's return work was resumed more actively, and the team was further strengthened by the appointment of Mr. John Chadwick in July 1946. In March 1949 Mr. Wyllie was appointed sole Editor, and at the same time steps were taken to form an academic advisory committee. Professor W. M. Edwards joined the staff in 1950 as reader and critic; Mr. Chadwick left to take an academic post at Cambridge in 1952 and was replaced by Mr. (later Professor) C. L. Howard.

Mr. Wyllie's editorship terminated in April 1954, and Mr. P. G. W. Glare, who had joined the team in 1950, became Acting Editor. A fresh study of the situation in this year showed that a thorough revision of most of the material, including what had been hitherto thought approximately ready for the Printer, would be necessary before printing could begin, and that the final work would substantially exceed the limits laid down. The Delegates decided that efforts must be made to complete the Dictionary on the existing plan, though they authorized a further increase in length. In the autumn of 1955 Mr. Glare was appointed Editor, with an enlarged team that included Mr. R. H. Barrow and Mr. G. E. Turton (both of whom had joined in 1954), and Mr. R. C. Palmer (from 1957), and with occasional help from Mr. Chadwick in Cambridge. Since that date progress has been consistent and smooth, and the Delegates' confidence in the undertaking is such that publication by fascicle has been sanctioned. The work will be completed in eight fascicles, and it is hoped to publish one every two years.

The Oxford Latin Dictionary is based on an entirely fresh reading of the Latin sources. It follows, generally speaking, the principles of the Oxford English Dictionary, and its formal layout of articles is similar. Within each section or sub-section, quotations are arranged in chronological order, the first example showing, where practicable, the earliest known instance of that particular sense or usage. Accidents of transmission and the concentration of much of the available material within a very short space of time have, however, made it difficult to trace the history of many words; in consequence, not too much reliance should be placed on chronology in the arrangement of senses.

The later limit of the period covered by this dictionary is necessarily imprecise. In practice it means that most of the jurists quoted in Justinian's Digest have been included, although they run over into the third century, while patristic writings from the last years of the second century have not been drawn upon. (A proposal that the Dictionary should be extended to include Christian Latin had been finally rejected in 1951.) A further complication is that there are many texts of uncertain date whose inclusion or rejection must be arbitrary. But within these limits an attempt has been made to treat thoroughly all known words from any source, literary or non-literary. In addition, proper names have been included where their intrinsic importance appears to warrant it, or where their inclusion was thought to help in the understanding of literary texts. Only brief etymological notes have been given; readers should refer to the standard etymological dictionaries for further information. The inclusion of articles on the principal suffixes used in word-formation is an innovation in Latin lexicography.

I. AUTHORS AND WORKS

THE references given in column one are normally the last possible for each work. This will make clear which system of chapter, paragraph, etc., division, or of pagination, is being followed, where two or more exist. Authors used as secondary sources are printed in lower case. The full form of post-classical or modern collections, anthologies, etc., is given in the Supplementary List (II) below. The abbreviations for these are usually printed with a lower-case initial (e.g. anth., poet., trag.). In the indication of date Roman numerals refer to centuries.

In the description of Editions used OCT, T, and L refer to Oxford Classical Texts (Scriptorum Classicorum Bibliotheca Oxoniensis), Bibliotheca Teubneriana, and the Loeb Classical Library respectively. The editions cited are normally those used for the original excerpting of material. Important changes in later editions have been taken into account wherever possible.

IV. SIGNS AND OTHER CONVENTIONS

.. indicates an omitted part of a quotation.

— indicates a subdivision within a section as specified in a parenthesis immediately following, or corresponding to a semicolon in the definition. Also, when spaced, it indicates a change of speaker in passages of dialogue.

~ represents a fixed (unchangeable) portion of a word throughout an article. It has no etymological significance. In other cases a hyphen indicates a detached part of a word.

* indicates a hypothetical word, or a word no longer extant.

[ ] enclose author's name in cases of doubtful ascription.

Small capitals are used in two ways: (i) for printing inscriptions, (ii) as a form of cross-reference, indicating that further information will be found under the word so printed.

Vowel quantities. Normally only long vowels in a metrically indeterminate position are marked (e.g. audītus, auē). Final 'o's, though frequently scanned short in Silver Latin, are regularly given their original value.

Main senses indicated by numbers may be followed by one or more subsections; these are introduced by letters thus: 1..b..c, etc. Some senses consist of two or more equally important elements and in these the letter a also is employed, e.g. 2a..b, etc.

Alternative spellings, declensions, etc. are sometimes indicated by Greek letters. Again, equally important forms are shown by α, β, γ, etc., minor variants by β, γ, etc.

V. ORTHOGRAPHY

Consonantal and vocalic 'i' and 'u' respectively are not distinguished. Where assimilation of consonants takes place in a compound word, the more common form, as printed in the editions, is normally used for the lemma. For example, compounds of ad- and p- appear under adn-. while compounds of ad- and n-, in which assimilation is not common, appear under adn-. General cross-references are provided thus: adp-: see APP-; ann-: for cpds. of ad- see ADN-.

VI. NOTE ON SUFFIXES

The articles on suffixes are not intended as a complete historical account of all Latin formations; they are no more than an indication of the principal elements regarded from a synchronistic point of view. One of the most characteristic features of Latin suffixes is their growth by misdivision: for instance, the elementary suffix -nus gives rise to a group of secondary suffixes -ānus, -īnus, -ernus, -tinus. All such, if sufficiently common, are listed separately; where there may be doubt about the correct allocation, words are treated as containing the more specific, or longer, form of the suffix (e.g. arcanus is analysed as ARCA+-ANUS, even though historically a more correct analysis might be +-NVS). It is in many cases impossible to determine the historical facts, since in the classical period -anus was clearly felt as a living suffix, whereas -nus was no longer employed in new formations. Some apparent discrepancies in the analysis of suffixes will be explained in the articles in question: thus the analysis of defensio as DEFENDO+-TIO depends upon the historical fact that two dental sounds in contact developed into a sibilant. The examples quoted in the articles on suffixes are only a small selection.
